

the following is a quote from an article, on cnnfn.com today, entitled "Report: Cingular opposes calls on planes":

"An FAA spokesman told the paper that when it comes to calls on planes, the agency is looking at issues involving aircraft safety, not the social interaction of passengers."

I would suggest that the easily foreseen rage of people who are trapped at 30,000 feet next to other people yelling into their cell phones will be a serious matter of "aircraft safety".

Please don't put us in that position and have to apologize later for making the clearly misguided decision to allow the phone's use on board that will have contributed to some future disaster.

Please consider all the ramifications including "the social interaction of passengers."

Thank you.
